Caring for Our Own

At the latest report there were 500 destitute Americans in London. During one week 6,000 crossed the Channel into England for better assurance of some sort of passage home. During the same week 11,000 Americans had sailed from English shores for home, making a total of 56,000 started toward a happier land since the war began.

That there are 500 destitute Americans in London, however, is not bad news, but good news. That of 56,000 only 500 still need help shows that Uncle Sam has a rapid way of doing the thing necessary to the moment when the welfare of his children is at stake. It is generally true that no good American need fear desertion. It's a fine flag we're living under, and a good one to love.

Not So Bad, After All

JUST as the world has been mourning for several days the destruction by fire of Louvain comes an authentic report from London, via Rotterdam, that, after all, Louvain was not destroyed—that only the centre of the city was burned by the Germans and that the historic structures and art buildings had been saved.

Still trembling over the reported loss of history and art at Louvain, folk who lament such calamities hear with fear that an invasion of Paris might mean irreparable and tremendous damage to art. Perhaps the latest news from Louvain will be reassuring to Paris.

Certainly war should not destroy those things which belong not to the enemy, but to the world. We only wish there were as universal solicitude for lives of men in war as there seems to be for works of art.

A Great Power for Good

THE Co-operative Association of Virginia is accomplishing great things for the cause of education in Virginia. The value of its field work in creating sentiment for education, in inspiring improvements, in helping communities which assessing the incentive, need only guidance and help in raising the standards of rural schools, especially all over the State, can scarcely be estimated at this time. Other organizations and other public officials have done their part, but to the Co-operative Education Association must go a great part of the credit.

The report of Secretary Binford, on his return from a tour of the mountain districts of the State, is inspiring. More and better schools are found to be in existence. The people are taking great interest in the cause of education. And that is what is needed. It is only necessary to have the great mass of people aroused to make the public schools of Virginia the equal of those of any State in the Union.

The Man on the Job

DIFFER with President Wilson if you will, politically, argue with him, if you will as a scholar; call him names or uphold his hand as the mood strikes you, and there is no harm done.

But it is certain that, without regard for party or platform, there is no man in America who will not applaud his determination to make no speeches in connection with the approaching campaign, for the reason that he thinks he is being paid to stay in Washington and attend to the presidential business.

That is a fine idea. It is a novelty, too. It is distinctly refreshing to find a man staying on the job who could so easily go into the field and make votes by the thousands. Woodrow Wilson has work to do and proposes to do it. He is also impressing upon Congress a little of that work which might have otherwise been tangled up with a motion to adjourn.

Differ with the man on the job if you will, but being on the job, gets over the footlights into the great American audience, and is perhaps a better speech in itself than any President Wilson could make on the stump.

Vice—and Morality

THE Mayor of Atlantic City, addressed by the individuals of a church congregation on the subject of tangoing and vice on the beach, referred to one of the church women that he could not see vice; that he was too old to personally be vicious; that in his opinion, "a lot of morality in this world is nothing but vice grown tired." This the lady accepts as a personal allusion to her own morality, and has threatened to horsewhip the Mayor. Of course, the Mayor meant nothing personal, but he'll have a hard time proving that to the excited lady in the case.

However the horsewhipping may come out, the Mayor certainly makes a plain point. Youth, hot-blooded, eager, able to sit up nights and get to work unencumbered next morning, building air castles and dreams, hunting up cosy corners and odd nooks, seeking that which age has experienced and finished with, has a viewpoint of vice and morality radically different from that of old age or even older middle life. Many of the things grown folk used to do, now that they have done them and outgrown them, appear in others to be highly reprehensible. The worst critics of the large will undoubtedly be found on the other side of mature experience.

Aren't there any game laws in Europe to protect aeroplanes?

Will the Czar call Berlin Nickrograd when his armies get there?
